

THE LITERATURE OF THE BIBLE

As I often say, Kabbalah and Jewish mysticism are essentially extensions of the literature of the Bible and rabbinic literature.

Some people want to study Kabbalah without any reference to the rest of Judaism, but for better or worse, it doesn't really work that way.

Thus, the more you know about the Bible, the better off you will be in your study of Kabbalah.

The Hebrew Bible is known as the “Tanakh” which is an acronym for its three parts – Torah (the five Books of Moses), Nevi'im (prophets), and Ketuvim (writings).

To study the Hebrew Bible, it is also good to know a little Hebrew. However, if you don't, then if you at least learn the Hebrew alphabet and possess a good dictionary of Biblical Hebrew, then by itself will enhance your studies quite a bit.

The Torah, or the five Books of Moses, is often interpreted differently within Judaism than without. Much of this is due to the fact that the text contains both many wordplays and interesting numerical patterns.

For example, Adam was called “Adam” because his body was came from “adamah,” the earth. Similarly, if you look at the Priestly Blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) in Hebrew, you will notice that the first verse contains 3 words, the second verse has 5 words, and the third verse has 7 words. This creates the arithmetic sequence 3, 5, 7, and the sum of these numbers is 15 which is the gematria (numerical value) of Yah, one of the names for God in Hebrew. These patterns are unlikely to be coincidences.

Contrary to Mosaic tradition, scholarly analysis suggests that the Hebrew Bible originated as a series of oral stories which were later committed to writing. This belief that the Bible came from a variety of sources is known as the Documentary Hypothesis.

Scholars have detected four main sources for the Biblical narratives that they designate as J (from the southern Kingdom of Judah), E (from the northern Kingdom of Israel), D (from authors in Jerusalem), and P (from the priests).

Furthermore, we often find in the Bible what appear to be conflicting stories that have been pushed together side by side. For example, in Genesis we find two creation stories for humans – one in which man and woman are created together (Genesis 1:27), and another in which woman is created from a rib or side of man (Genesis 2:21-22).

Given that the stories in the Bible were originally oral traditions, I suspect that much of the wordplay and number play found in the Bible existed originally as memory devices, to help the storyteller remember the exact tale. However, I am also certain that other verbal and numerical patterns were inserted into the text in order to impart additional meaning. It is those additional patterns that we often seek to uncover by analyzing both the words and their corresponding numbers.

An important subset of the Bible is what I know as the Wisdom Literature. This term usually refers to the books of Job, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Proverbs, and various Psalms.

Notice, for example, that we find in Torah the promise that if we do good, then good things will happen, and if we do bad, then bad things will happen. However, our experience suggests that the world is more complex than that, and it often appears that the good suffer while the bad prosper.

This kind of inconsistency demands from us a deeper probing into the nature of reality, and this is what much of the Wisdom Literature does. And I believe that this is the true start of Jewish mysticism and Kabbalah. Life experience requires that we look for deeper explanation of what the Torah teaches, and the result is a greater and more mystical view of the world.

Thus, I particularly recommend not only reading the Torah, but also a thorough study of Job, Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs before beginning the study of Jewish mysticism. This won't be time wasted as many of the concepts of Jewish mysticism and Kabbalah find their origin within the Wisdom Literature of Judaism.

And later on, when we get to the Zohar, we'll see that it is Song of Songs that it is very important to have some familiarity with. This book is the portion of Wisdom Literature that is quoted most often in the Zohar, and that is because Song of Songs is seen as a metaphor for the love between God and the Jewish people.
